

We Need YOU!

Volunteer as a peer reviewer!

Support content development for your profession

American Nurse Journal (ANJ) peer reviewers use their expertise to help ensure the accuracy of manuscripts so that published content provides readers with practical, evidence-based information that will prove useful in bedside clinical care as well as in professional nurse development and well-being.

The peer review process:

Quality peer reviews provide content guidance, evaluate clinical accuracy, and offer constructive comments that help the author improve their manuscript. Peer review does not involve editing for grammar, punctuation, or style.

WE ASK FOR YOUR COMMENTS ON THE FOLLOWING:

- Is the content relevant to nursing?
- Is the information accurate and complete?
- Does the information flow logically?
- Are any key references missing?
- Do illustrations, figures, tables add to the content?
- Does the author provide nursing implications?
- Are appropriate guidelines, standards, and research cited?
- Is the manuscript free from stereotypes, offensive language, and bias?

The ANJ executive editorial director oversees the peer-review process and makes final decisions about acceptance, revision, and rejection based on reviewer feedback.

ANJ uses a double-anonymous peer-review process—authors don't know the identity of the reviewers and reviewers don't know the identity of authors.

Peer review expectations:

The executive editorial director selects peer reviewers based on their areas of expertise, with the aim of matching reviewer knowledge with manuscript content. Prior experience as a peer reviewer or publication in a peer-review journal can prove helpful in understanding the process.
